 Drag the blue dots to the starting point and ending point. Memorizing key points about my life and career for this speech turned out to be very helpful. There were many times during interviews and meeting new people that I used some of the phrases I dearned.

For two mouths, Stephanie helped me search the "help wanted" ads for a new job. Since I had so many years of work experience following my stroke, and good luck in previous job searches, I felt confident that I'd be able to find something good. We responded to every accounting, general clerical and research assistant job we could find, as well as anything related to real estate: office work for mortgage companies, rental management, and construction. I had three different resumes highlighting different aspects of my career, listing the eight different computer programs I used, and the various require excellent speaking abilities. They told me require excellent speaking abilities. They told me and they said that they would be delighted to see me. In the next two weeks, I felt happy making my plans and thinking about what I'd do when I got to Florida. Just having something nice to look forward to made me feel better.

I was a little nervous. This would be my first trip traveling alone since my stroke. I'd have to get to the airport, manage my luggage, check in, get to the right gate on time, and get on the airplane without Stephanie's assistance. This was a challenge, and I was ready to prove myself. Since I was going to Florida, I decided to pack "light." My parents wouldn't care if I wore the same shirt more than once. This way, I could fit everything I'd need into one carry-on bag. When I traveled with Stephanie, we usually took two bags: a larger one with most of our clothing, and this little carry-on, with a pull-out handle and wheels. Stephanie took the larger one, and I usually was in charge of the carry-on, so I knew I could manage it.

Since Stephanie was at work the morning I left for Florida, I had to take a taxi to the airport by myself. I had a note card with all the flight information written on one side so I could easily refer to it. I showed the taxi driver the card, so he knew to take
