What does it take to raise good citizens in our new globalized society? How can feminist parenting theory help us re-examine our own approaches to interpersonal dynamics in families, but also in the workplace? This talk introduces the theory and practice of feminist intersectional parenting to a diverse audience, considering its implications for parents of young children as well as grandparents, adults with no children, and anyone interested in interacting with young people.

Christina Michaud is a Senior Lecturer in the College of Arts and Sciences Writing Program. She has taught classes on race, class, and gender in both the Writing Program and the Women's, Gender, and Sexuality Studies Program.
